Abstract And Colour Techniques In Painting

Creating abstract art is an opportunity to break away from the tried and tested. Experiment with new techniques. Paint with the "wrong" kind of brush. Embrace your mistakes, because when you experiment there are no mistakes only happy accidents. Distort Like mirrors in a funhouse there are many ways to distort a subject. Squash and stretch forms, shift and substitute colours.

Some painters think that abstract painting techniques need to be disharmonic - but it doesn't have to be that way. A painting can affect you in two different ways - one way is: luring you in with beauty, offering a space or a scene that you're free to respond to - or not. The painting doesn't do anything directly: it waits, until you are ready to open your soul, and allow the experience.

Try this: Try allowing a section of your painting to be more realistic or literal, and make the rest abstract. This could mean leaving it looking unfinished, or introducing shapes that don't 'make sense'. Your realistic area can be – and likely will naturally be – the focal point, and the abstract shapes or areas can define and support that through the contrast.

In order to define it, first let's take a look at some of the ways a painter can organize his efforts when painting in an abstract or nonobjective way. While both styles rely on the elements of art (shape, value, line, color, contrast, texture, form within a space), abstract art usually has a basis in reality, as in something being "abstracted." The artist is the one in charge of what is ...

I'd start by letting the subject matter of the painting determine the colors you select. Go with your instinct, not your intellect. Initially limit the number of colors you use to five -- a light, medium, dark, and two tones in between. Then paint with them according to tone, not hue. If you want to use more colors, I'd start by adding complementaries. Use the color straight from the tube ...
