I really did (and do) love David Sedaris' writing and Barrel Fever is no exception to this. Predominantly I think it's his dry turn of phrase that I like, and some phrases I read over and over just for the pleasure of the weirdness. I give it four stars instead of five, perhaps unfairly. The fifth star I have reserved for another of his books When You Are Engulfed in Flames, simply because of ...

+ Barrel fever - the titular story appears to be Sedaris's crowning achievement in being insensitive to the mentally ill, poor family relations, more abusive parents, addiction, fat jokes, I could go on. The 2 essays are barely worth mentioning. A last note: everything is written in a first person narrative and there are weird similarities to Holden Caulfield of Catcher in the Rye. He even ...

Where as "Pretty" contains mostly true stories about Sedaris's life, the first section of Barrel Fever (and the largest chunk of the book) was made up of fictional essays. The essays are still hilarious and after having re-read them since, they hold up as some of the craziest writing that I've read to date. It's clear that the earlier Sedaris was a bit more daring and willing to go for some ...
