The Munich crisis: the battle over appeasement Adolf Hitler wasn't Neville Chamberlain's only foe during the Munich crisis of 1938. With Winston Churchill raging, Lord Halifax covering his own back, and protestors on the streets, the quest for 'peace for our time' almost brought down the British government, writes Robert Crowcroft

Faber's Munich: the 1938 Appeasement Crisis, is the best general-reader account of Munich as well as being the more recent to date. Both well informed and lively, it tells the engrossing story of what must rate as one of the greatest diplomatic blunders of all time. We all know how Neville Chamberlain, the British prime minister, surrendered the Sudetenland and with it Czechoslovakia to Hitler, not realising that far from buying peace he was making a major strategic contribution to the ...

In September 1938, with war against Germany seeming increasingly likely, Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain flew to Munich (according to a British Pathe newsreel, his first trip in an aeroplane), to meet the German leader. His aim of this 'mission of peace' was to secure a guarantee that there'd be no further German aggression.

The Munich Agreement was an astonishingly successful strategy for the Nazi party leader Adolf Hitler (1889–1945) in the months leading up to World War II. The agreement was signed on Sept. 30, 1938, and in it, the powers of Europe willingly conceded to Nazi Germany's demands for the Sudetenland in Czechoslovakia to keep "peace in our time."

The Munich crisis is one of the most controversial episodes of modern times, the negative connotations of appeasement etched in the collective consciousness. The debate over why France and Britain pursued a policy, which turned out to be such an abysmal failure, remains unresolved to this day, more than seventy years later. Beck writes: "In the past half century, few episodes of diplomatic ...
