These papers derive from an international conference on organised crime in the ancient world, held at Lampeter in September 1996. Only four of the papers originally presented have not been submitted to this volume. The editor sincerely hopes that they will see the light of day elsewhere. The conference was made possible by generous support from the University of Wales Institute of Classics and Ancient History, and the convenor and editor would like to thank its Chairman, Professor Stephen ...

Two major findings are presented: first, archaeologists tend almost unanimously to consider that organized crime operates within the 'global' antiquities market, but when asked about their own personal experiences with looting on the sites where they work, many fewer report observations of organized crime; second, however, it is apparent that respondents' conceptions of "organized crime" involve media-driven, stereotypical representations of mafia-style structures. Therefore ...

Moreover, it seems that there is a connection between organized crime and antiquities forgery. In addition, people with higher status are more often involved in antiquities forgery. With respect to the stolen objects, coins were by far the most preferred objects when it comes to forgery, and forgers are also using mostly bronze when it comes to these forgeries. Antiquity looting seems to have many hidden aspects, and the varied nature of antiquities smuggling requires the cooperation of a ...
