The Thirty Years War was in part a religious war -- Protestants versus Catholics (and each of those religious factions was itself internally divided). It was in part a political war among shifting alliances of the various states of German-speaking peoples. It also was a political war between the Hapsburgs and the Bourbons, and as such it was a European war fought primarily on German soil. For Wedgwood, it is best summed up as an unnecessary, meaningless war:

The Thirty Years War shows her at her epic best." -- From the introduction by Anthony Grafton "This is a masterful narrative, written by one of the great exponents of that all-too-rare skill. Threading her way through one of the most complex and fraught eras of European history, Wedgwood gives all who have followed her an object lesson in clarity and readability that has not been surpassed."

Wedgwood never returned to LSE and her PhD remained uncompleted. The lack of a PhD did not prevent Wedgwood publishing many significant works on seventeenth century history. The Thirty Years War appeared in 1938 and during the Second World War she worked as a literary advisor to the publishers Jonathan Cape and the literary editor of Time and Tide.
