The next time you talk about trusting in God in class, please don't just repeat the word "trust" a lot like many teachers do. Instead, find a relevant example that the kids would understand (like the one in the script above) and start your explanation with that. This is how you drive Bible truth into the hearts and minds of kids. This is how we should be teaching them to trust in God ...

Trusting God can be scary. We can't see Him, hear Him, or touch Him, and He never promised us a life free from difficult or painful circumstances. It's much easier and more comforting to our flesh to trust something tangible. Something that guarantees us it'll do what we want it to do. It reminds me of an event that took place toward the end of King Asa's life in 2 Chronicles 16. Asa ...

Embrace God's Word for your kids. God knows our adult children in ways that we don't, and He loves them far beyond what we can see, so we can trust that He is at work in their lives. Not that this trust ever comes easily. The best way I've found to anchor this trust — and let that mooring give shape to my prayers for my children — is through the promises in Scripture. "If you abide ...
